

"A human being is a part of the whole called by us universe, a part limited in time and space..." – Einstein

Limitation has stayed in basic human nature along through all change and evolution our species has gone through, it is a simple misconception of presence as a separate one rather than a piece of a whole. This is everpresent and more than obvious even in our nearest surroundings, limitation stands strong against our track of thought rendering most blind. As complex as a human mind is, perspective in thinking will always stay a difficulty for our basic understanding of the world around us. When set on a task or stuck with a single goal, a human mind loses awareness of what's beyond him, of the absurdity of linear thinking and complexity of what's outside him.

As Einstein himself puts it this is but a delusion of a prison, and in many ways I agree. Put in simplest terms a prison stands as a good representative of the mindset we set ourselves in, this mind state that not only limits us in our personal growth but leaves us severed from what could be considered "normal social interaction". By this I mean the primal exchange of knowledge and emotion with another person, a simple conversation or more. When our ego stands in place of reason how we perceive others and understand the concept of solitude morphs, we start seeing our surroundings as an opportunity for satisfaction, feeding into our personal needs or more precisely what we think our needs are.

It is a current of modern society and the capitalist system at power to switch focus to singular tasks in exchange for profit, better income. What's troubling is how often we miss something this apparent. We are taught focus and concentration from an early age, the main goal being to limit our freedom of thought so it better fits the needs of society we live in, yet many still miss the damage this causes. Little change has been made to the way our educational systems work, the idea still being to categorize and label. Here, is where the problem lies. We are perceived as machines, and as such stay discouraged from opinionated thought and expression, that being where our lack of freedom roots.

Einstein further states that our task must be to free ourselves of such thinking. Must being the choice of word to accent the fatality of our illogical present views. Fatality in sense of end of progressive growth and further evolution of consciousness. He mentions the widening of compassion, something that lacks in most people's attitudes towards life and others. One of the biggest mistakes a human can make is falling under the influence of despair and disappointment, from here only downspiral continues. The irony and absurdity of life is more than evident yet we only feed into the idea if we stand by the belief that it's there by meaningless. No matter our purpose or actual lack of one, it is on us to use the chances we have, the chances we're given, no matter how that may be. And one apparent illusion is the illusion of solitude life. As social beings it is our primal need to interact and grow not only off of ourselves but others, to connect, perceive and understand, concepts which often require insight of things outside us, "bigger" than us .

"We are all living together, even if most don't act like it, we all have the same roots and we are all branches of the same tree" – Unknown

The only other choice we have is to stand in time, staying as we are, never reaching to anything greater, and if I'm asked, there is no worse choice to be made .
